

African languages: True, untrue and everything in between

Hannah Gibson

African languages continue to operate from a position of marginalisation, both on the continent and globally. This talk considers a wide range of 'truths' and 'untruths' about African languages and explores what can be done to improve our understanding of African languages, and their contribution to society and to our knowledge of human language.